Credit: Svetlana Tiourina Want to learn more about how we work and drive change? Watch here: As an investigative reporter, you will investigate global affairs and write articles centered around your research. Your sources may vary from government officials to representatives of organizations. In your position as an investigative reporter, you will investigate crimes, corruption, and major political and socio-economic events, and it can take you months to write up reports on events. On a daily basis, you are required to do extensive research on events and gather as many credible sources as possible to support the articles you have written. Your reports may lead to the exposure of those in positions of power so that they may be held accountable for their wrongdoings. Your reports and findings may be shared either on broadcasting news networks or on online news outlets. As an investigative reporter, you need to have excellent verbal communication skills as you are expected to ask difficult and sometimes controversial questions and deliver reports on news broadcasting networks. Your written skills need to be top-notch as you will be writing up several reports that the public will read. Furthermore, you need to be a brilliant researcher. To become an investigative reporter, you need to obtain a bachelor's degree in journalism and couple this with language training to sharpen your written communication skills. There is more than meets the eye when it comes to being an investigative reporter. For example, did you know that they make an average of $28.58 an hour? That's $59,454 a year!
